CAPSULE HOTELS

How small can your hotel room be?

If you are staying in a certain type of a hotel in Japan, then the answer could be just one metre by one metre by two metres. These hotels are mainly intended for businessmen who miss the last train home. Instead of paying for an expensive taxi ride, Japanese businessmen can rent a capsule, a kind of plastic box to sleep in, for around four or five thousand yen.

There are no reservations and no long-term stays. Guests can check in at any time after about 4pm. At reception they are shown to a room with lockers where they deposit their clothes and their belongings. In return, they receive a cotton bathrobe and slippers to wear. Then guests go to their “rooms”, rows of capsules on each floor stacked about three storeys high. Each one is equipped with a mattress, a pillow, and a quilt. There is also a light, clock, mirror and a TV hanging from the ceiling. At the end of the capsule is a small curtain which you can close to separate your space from all the other men sleeping in the same area. Check out time is around 9 o’clock the next day.

Many capsule hotels offer a large number of services. There are vending machines which sell soft drinks and variety of snacks. Some even sell clean socks and underwear. Each floor has a shared toilet with lots of toothbrushes, razors and shaving equipment. There are also coin-operated showers. The more expensive hotels also have restaurants and health spas with baths, saunas, and a massage service.

Although the capsules have been called names such as “dog kennels” or “coffins”, they are surprisingly comfortable. The biggest problem is noise pollution. So it’s best to bring your own earplugs!
